Category:Videotelephony Category:Videotelephony softwareWith the removal of about 400 special powers from the House of Lords, will we return to the 1980s and the days of the constitutional dukes? At the moment, the Lords have a power to veto bills on their own accord, and this has been held to be a popular rather than unpopular power. Before the Constitutional Reform Act of 2005, the Lords had the power to veto the whole of a bill, with no grounds for that veto, and this could occur at any stage of the bill's passage. It was a bit like a "nuclear" veto that might be used in times of war, but was not popular with those at the centre of the political stage. It worked, but it had a nasty habit of turning good constitutional reforms into bad ones. The power to veto bills on the grounds that they contradicted the constitution has also proven a thorn in the side of the Commons, with a veto on the House of Lords over-riding the actions of the Commons on such issues as the independence of the judiciary and the nature of devolution. In the early 2000s, it was widely expected that the Constitutional Reform Act of 2005 would allow for a more credible and acceptable veto, and at last that is happening. The House of Lords will have the power to veto only on those issues identified in the bill as being of constitutional significance, and this is the key difference between the more draconian veto power of the past and the present. It is hoped that this will lead to less controversial bill passing through the Lords, and a less cumbersome way of delivering such major reforms. "More controversial bill passing through the Lords" might sound like an oxymoron, but this will not be the case, as this is an opportunity to stop bad bills
